

Diego Meza is a diocesan priest and holds a PhD in Social Sciences. He currently serves as Director of the Diocesan Caritas of Ipiales, a small town on the Colombian-Ecuadorian border. He also teaches at the Faculty of Social Sciences at the Pontifical Gregorian University and at the Center for Latin American Research and Studies at the University of Nariño in Pasto, Colombia. His main research interests include social suffering and structural violence, indigenous communities in Colombia, and the relationship between Catholicism and politics. Within the next two months, he will publish a book titled Catholicisms and Politics in Latin America.
